Description:

Can a person's life really be over at just 19? Sarah challenges this notion when, after flunking out of school, she decides to return to her hometown to try to gain a better understanding of what might be holding her back in life. Home is the hardest place for Sarah to teach herself to stop being a victim. But it is also likely the most important place to do it. She uses her newfound knowledge about herself to pull others out of similar crises, as love is rediscovered and friendship is borne out of adversity. Angel Rock Leap is riddled with lost and broken characters, each guilty of hurting those around them because they, themselves, hurt. This is an anti-bullying story that is very Christian principle-based, with particular emphasis on the idea that hurting people hurt people.

A quote from Angel Rock Leap by Ellen Weisberg and Ken Yoffe is at the core of this well-written, page-turning, coming of age story. "It seemed so easy to feel sorry for oneself. And to blame others for a life not fully lived." Growing up, we all experience childhood traumas. These inner wounds, if not healed, erode our self-worth leading us to search externally for the validation we crave. Inner wounds become an integral part of how we see ourselves and form the paradigm with which we establish relationships. Returning to her hometown, Sarah faces her past with the help of her best friend Scott – a delightful character and "Greek chorus" who is insightful and adds comic relief. Letting go of the past, and healing the wounds is at the core of this story which effortlessly weaves humor, anger, pain and suspense. 5/5 Stars from Luna Saint Claire – author of The Sleeping Serpent
